The court may not have waited for five years for this case to come to court. The court may have believed that the case could have been litigated immediately by the real estate lawyer. We also know that filing this case was painful, expensive, and time consuming to the lawyer involved. The court probably did not wait for five years for this case to come to court. The court probably concluded that this real estate lawyer was being selfish by refusing to sign the documents and not paying his attorney fees because the lawyer had probably already been paid in full by his client. A lawyer can be dismissed from a client's case for being uncooperative. If the lawyer is representing a client and refuses to accept part of his fee and later sue his client, he will not be able to collect any of the money he is owed. This case may have taken five years to come to court because the court wanted to be sure that this real estate lawyer did not argue that he did not owe anything to his client. The client may not have wanted to tell the court that he had paid the lawyer and still the lawyer refused to sign the documents. The court may have been trying to avoid having a case where the lawyer argued that he did not owe the client anything. The court did not want to have a lawyer argue that he did not owe the client any money. The court did not want to have a lawyer argue that he did not owe any money, even though the client had already paid the lawyer. A dispute over attorney fees can make the whole case go away for the client. There may be some cases where the client does not want to settle because of the money it will take to settle. However, there are other cases where it is possible to settle the case and get back every penny of your money plus attorney fees if you have any money left in the estate. You should consult with a lawyer before taking any action concerning your estate. This website
