Distinct glucocorticoid receptor composition is associated with variations of steroid-responsive periodicity in the amygdala of healthy men. The hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis controls several central functions such as sleep, learning, and mood, with its reactivity in the brain being under the control of negative feedback. Here, we investigated whether variability in this system may contribute to differences in human sleep. We found an inverse relationship between basal cortisol levels and the duration of the early morning sleep span (delay in the phase advance of the sleep rhythm compared with the circadian phase) in a homogeneous group of healthy men. This relationship was reversed following dexamethasone treatment. In parallel, we found a marked decrease in the adrenal glucocorticoid receptor (GR) nuclear level in men with longer sleep span, whereas a relatively stable GR composition was observed in men with an early morning sleep span. These data indicate that the variability in adrenal reactivity, measured as a decrease in the GR nuclear level, is associated with an increase in the duration of the sleep span in healthy men. This might reflect the effects of corticosteroid negative feedback on the glucocorticoid system, with implications for the adaptation to stress and the regulation of the sleep-wake cycle in humans.Q: How to keep my friends from turning against me? But as pointed out earlier, I don't know whether it is feasible to call grep from within a Python script. Is there a way to perform a search for "Ho Gia in" and then loop through the resulting file paths? I know I could do it in the shell, but I need to do it in Python. A: According to grep man page you can pass multiple patterns for search on stdin (also add -v and -w options): cat file | grep -E '^Ho Gia in' | xargs grep -Hn path | awk '{print $4}' | cat file | grep -E '^Ho Gia in' can be easily shortened to grep -Ef file. . If the membership is not paid, it is the risk of the individual concerned that if the entry is accepted in spite of paying membership, he will be left in the cold by not being admitted to the ceremony at which the form of the charter is delivered. Yet, like the Mertons, the Wilkinsons and the other pious band of British well-to-do about whom Mrs Gaskell wrote the famous work which gave rise to the phenomenon of the 'walking delegates', the Mertons and the Wilkinsons and their like serve to substantiate the point of view that the fundamental law of the State is not that of voluntary association, which is the very essence of the law of association, but the law of the strongest, and that this fundamental law is ever in operation in its enforcement in the society of this country. Why should the State wish to place the economic and political advantages of a particular set of people above that of other people? Why should it desire to protect some and punish others? Why should it seek to enforce and encourage a particular set of feelings and sentiments in the minds of individuals? Since that would be the result of such a position, how can the State be logically justified in enforcing the position that it should do so, to the detriment of all other societies, and to the detriment of the State itself? The law of the strongest is what the law is. It is the principle of 'might makes right' that is now the law of the land. But it will be the law of every land until the day of judgment.
